Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Cooper-Alley house is a two story farmhouse located near the confluence of the Flat Rock River and Conn's Creek in Shelby County, Indiana. The original section of the house is rectangular in plan, with a foundation of stone brought up from the nearby Flat Rock River. The exterior walls are of brick fired on the site and laid up in common bond, with header courses occurring at random intervals. The simple gable roof is of medium pitch and is presently covered with asphalt composition shingles. The single chimney which now serves the structure is located towards the north end of the building.

The main entry is located in the south wall of the structure. This wall, a gable end, consists of three bays. The easternmost bay on the ground floor contains the front door, which features a rectangular transom overhead and an engaged pier and sidelight on each side. The two remaining first floor bays and all three second floor bays contain six-over-six double-hung windows with plain stone sills and lintels. A few of the glass panes in these windows are original to the house.

Over the second floor windows in the south gable is a pair of narrow windows with round arch tops. These two windows are separated by an engaged column with a fluted square shaft. The capital of this column also serves as the impost for the pair of round arch hood molds which surmount these narrow windows. This window treatment is similar to that found on many later Italianate houses. No other opening in the structure exhibits this type of detailing; all other windows in the original section of the house have plain stone sills and lintels.

A small, one story addition was constructed at the rear of the house in the late 19th century. Built of red brick similar to that used in the original structure, the addition differs from the rest of the building in the detailing of the door and window openings. Sills are of rock-faced stone, and instead of lintels, segmental round arches are employed.

The interior of the house features an entry hall leading to the large parlor on the west. This parlor and the adjoining dining room both contain original fireplaces. A small bedroom, a bathroom, and a modern kitchen are also located on the first floor. A staircase rises to the second floor from the east side of the entry hall. This staircase is among the more decorative features of the house, with a turned newel post and turned balusters. The stairs lead to a second floor hallway, which provides access to three large bedrooms, all with built-in closets. All second floor doors are original and have the original hardware. Some have been painted with white enamel, but the rest retain the original wood-grained paint finish. On the first floor, almost all woodwork has been painted with white enamel.

Inasmuch as this property has always been part of a working farm, several outbuildings are located on the site. Most notable among these are a small concrete block building once used as an icehouse, and a large barn constructed with heavy timbers and thought to be over 80 years old. However, these are not included within the designated boundary.

Statement of Significance (In one paragraph)

The Cooper-Alley House is one of the finest and best preserved mid-19th century, upper-middle class farmhouses remaining in the area. The builder, Edmund Cooper, was a locally prominent farmer who also served as Justice of the Peace, County Commissioner, and Representative to the Indiana General Assembly. He constructed this house on a commanding site overlooking a valley near the confluence of the Flat Rock River and Conn's Creek. The building features an interesting combination of Greek Revival and Italianate design elements, arranged in an unpretentious manner. The house has always been carefully maintained and remains a prominent local landmark.
