Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Davenport-Bradfield House is a two story brick, Italianate style structure located on the near northside of Sheridan, Indiana. Constructed for a local physician in 1875, the home features an irregular plan, a hipped roof, and a large decorative porch. The present owners, who purchased the property in late 1978, are currently restoring the structure.

It is thought that, when constructed, the home's main entry was the doorway located on the north facade. This narrow facade is two bays wide, and features paired, double-hung, rectangular windows in the east bay on both floor levels. A single-leaf entry door appears in the ground floor west bay, and a single, double-hung, rectangular window is contained in the second floor west bay. Both the door and the windows are contained in segmental-arched openings with brick voussoirs; the windows also feature limestone sills. The cornice features a narrow plain frieze and scroll-cut modillions.

Sometime in the 1920's the orientation of the house was changed so that the east elevation became the main facade. The current main entry, flanked by sidelights, is located in the center of the projecting area at the north end of this facade. Large, segmental-arched openings containing paired rectangular, double-hung windows appear in the bays on either side of the entry, and also in the corresponding bays on the second floor. The cornice detailing employed on the north facade is repeated on the east facade and on around the rest of the structure.

Perhaps the most decorative element of the house is the large porch which stretches across the entire east facade. This one-story porch features a sloping roof supported by turned wood posts. Scroll-sawn brackets and modillions, turned pendants, and a paneled frieze are used throughout this porch.

Besides the change in the orientation of the main facade, several other alterations were made to the house in the 1920's. A porch addition was built on the west facade near the back of the house, and a small sun porch was installed on the south (rear) facade. A narrow, one-car garage was also constructed as an extension of the one-story wing which projects from the rear (south) facade. On the interior, two large rooms on the second floor were each divided in half, yielding four small bedrooms, with walk-in closets. The clawfoot bathtub originally in the downstairs bathroom was relocated to a new bathroom that was installed on the second floor. Some changes in the location of doorways were also made at this time.

Since their purchase of the property in 1978, the current owners have replaced the deteriorated roof, repaired and repainted the porch, and removed the vines which obscured the entire north facade. In the near future they hope to strip off and replace all of the old wallpaper, refinish the floors and woodwork, and repair various sections of broken plaster.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Davenport-Bradfield House is significant for its architecture and for its association with some of Sheridan's most prominent citizens. A simple brick Italianate structure with an ornate porch, this 1875 home was originally built for one of Sheridan's early physicians. Subsequent owners included a local industrialist and a long-time local businessman.

The Davenport-Bradfield House features the irregular massing, hipped roof, and segmentalarched openings typical of Italianate homes of the late 19th century. Although some modifications and additions have been made to the structure, the major (i.e., north and east) facades remain relatively unchanged. Of particular interest is the porch on the east facade which features turned posts, scroll-sawn trim, decorative brackets and a paneled frieze.

The house was constructed in 1875 by Henderson E. Davenport, a Civil War veteran who graduated from medical school in 1872. He established his practice in Millwood (renamed Sheridan in the 1880's) shortly after graduation, and soon became locally prominent. He is best remembered for his role as one of the founders of the Hamilton County Medical Society. Davenport remained in this house until his death in 1909.

Davenport's widow sold the home to William N. Wilson, the founder of the Indiana Condensed Milk Company. This company was to become one of Sheridan's largest and longest-lived industries, but while it was still in its infancy, Wilson was killed in an industrial accident. His son, Taylor Wilson, who succeeded William Wilson as head of the company, inherited the home and sold it in 1917.

Joseph L. Vickery, who purchased the home from Wilson, owned and operated the Vickery Coal and Oil Company. It was during his ownership that several modifications were made to the house, including the addition of a garage, two small porches, and an additional bathroom.

Walter Bradfield purchased the home in 1926. Bradfield had operated a bicycle and gun store since 1898, but became well-known, locally, after 1903 when, with his brother-in-law, he established a harness-making business. Bradfield resided in the house for 52 years, until his death in 1978. The current owners acquired the home in 1978 and have since been working on the restoration of the structure.
