Agriculture & Archaeology

Agriculture plays a vital role in Indiana’s economy and the lives of many Hoosiers. Farmers are out in the fields for agricultural activities, but many times, in working the earth, they may run across archaeological materials. Many may recognize artifacts such as projectile points (often thought of as arrowheads). Rural farmsteads and early agricultural landscapes are important in Hoosier archaeology. There is much to be learned about these and other archaeological resources. Here is some information regarding archaeology and agriculture that may be of use and interest:

- Surface collecting of archaeological artifacts is legal, as long as you have landowner permission to be on the property and to collect the artifacts. Artifacts belong to the landowner.

- Do you have artifacts you would like to know more about? Our archaeologists are happy to assist you with learning more about the artifacts’ age, what they are made of, etc. When our other duties allow, we can assist you with collection identification.

- You are encouraged to report archaeological site locations to the Division of Historic Preservation and Archaeology. Knowing about these archaeological sites is important to all Hoosiers who want to understand and learn more about our past. Agriculture professionals are sometimes in the field more than archaeologists can be. Your information about the past can contribute to the understanding of thousands of years of history in our state.

- During agricultural activities that involve ground disturbance, if you find human remains, Indiana Code (IC 14-21-1-27) states that the DNR must be notified within two business days, and the remains must be treated or reburied.

- A person may not disturb the ground within 100 feet of a burial ground or cemetery for the purpose of erecting, altering, or repairing any structure without having an approved cemetery development plan from the DNR (Indiana Code 14-21-1-26.5).

- Indiana Code 35-43-1-2.1 does not allow agricultural activities (such as plowing) that damage a cemetery.

- If you witness, or know of, purposeful damage or looting of an archaeological site, contact the DHPA at 317-232-1646.

- The DHPA has many archaeological resources available if you are interested in learning more. Contact our office, or visit our webpage at on.IN.gov/dhpa.
