WHAT DOES THE INDIANA DEPARTMENT OF LABOR (IDOL) DO?
Made up of five key divisions, the Indiana Department of Labor works to serve all 6.6 million Hoosiers.

Consisting of both Construction and Industrial Compliance, the Indiana Occupational Safety and Health Administration (IOSHA) is dedicated to ensuring Hoosier workplace safety and health. Through safety and health inspections, IOSHA inspectors identify and ensure correction of workplace safety and health hazards.

Working with Hoosier employers, employees, professional groups and associations, INSafe provides occupational safety and health services that include on-site consultation, group training, educational materials and publications and technical assistance. Services and assistance are provided at no charge to the employer.

Headquartered in Vincennes, Indiana the Indiana Bureau of Mines inspects all Indiana’s underground coal mining operations as well as certifies specific mining occupations. At present there are six underground coal mines in Indiana.

Indiana’s Bureau of Child Labor inspects Hoosier businesses for compliance with the Indiana teen labor laws. The Bureau is also responsible for providing training and educational opportunities as well as resources to parents, teens, school administrators and Hoosier employers on Indiana teen labor laws.

The Wage and Hour Division provides guidance and support to both Hoosier employers and workers concerning several Indiana laws that govern how workers are paid, including minimum wage, overtime, payment of wages, wage deductions and Common Construction Wage.

Surveying Hoosier employers to assist in the identification of occupational safety and health injury and illness trends, the Quality Metrics and Statistics Division provides data for internal and external inquiries.
