OAG & PLA ROLES AND RESPONSIBILITIES AND OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL REPORT

Section Chief Heather Kennedy and DAG Ian Mathews appeared, along with Professional Licensing Agency compliance staff to be sure all are on the same page with compliance and the Consumer Division of the Office of the Attorney General (OAG) with changes made by the OAG within the last year. DAG Mathews reported that the funeral complaint numbers look fine based on the number filed with their office. He has filed two or three Administrative Complaints with the Board already this year. There was also a recent funeral home inspection failure complaint filed with the OAG that is actively being investigated and will come before the board in the near future. Mr. Matthews walked the board through the different kind of complaints and the process. Complaints filed with the OAG regarding license professions go to his division. Complaints are reviewed to determine if they have merit, then assigned to one of the 16 investigators and one of the 16 DAGs in the Licensing Division. They have four or five investigators for funeral and cemetery complaints. There are 53 open investigative files at this time. Some may be duplicates filed against the same licensee. The number has been as high as 75 to 100. The entire section has 1700 to 2000 complaints for all PLA boards. Funeral is somewhere in between in the terms of numbers compared to other boards. Investigators issue Subpoenas when needed, interview witnesses, and ask for response from respondent. Sometimes they engage an attorney at this point to represent them. Most don't admit to the allegations. Investigations usually take 6 to 12 months to investigate, however his section is trending toward the lower part of that due to efficiencies that have been made.

Once investigation is concluded all the documents will be put together, witnesses, evidence, etc., then it goes to the DAG to determine closure, warning letter, or administrative complaint filed, then to the Section Chief for final approval.

They are trying to narrow down and screen cases more so they are not investigating cases they know will not turn anything up to focus more time on cases with merit.

If PLA is complainant, a warning letter/closing letter goes to the board and Respondent (Compliance). PLA does not get a copy of the warning letter when the complaint is from the public due to confidentiality laws. All warning letters are kept on file at the OAG. This is a recent change in procedures. Leadership reviews all cases, warnings, closings, and complaints. There are seven pending files with the board. Two files disposed of today at the board meeting.

K. Matuszak asked how many years of experience combined, either formal or informal, do the investigators have in the funeral and cemetery industry. One was a county coroner, and Denise Singleton has worked with funeral and cemetery section for several years. They will have to gather the rest of the information and provide an answer later. K. Matuszak asked how they go about educating themselves in our field. Section Chief Kennedy indicated they have switched to teams structure July 2025 that work on a smaller number of boards (4 to 5) as to become better subject matter experts.

They are adding a training DAG to help with more subject matter expertise, especially higher volume boards. Andy Clayton from the Indiana Funeral Directors Association provided them with an abbreviated version of the crash review course about a year ago.

T. Sproles indicated he has spent countless hours on the phone with Denise Singleton when she started. He has 37 years of experience in funeral service. He indicated when there is one preneed fraud file, he knows there are more. He feels investigators do not know very detailed information, such as the difference in the gage of metal in a casket. When contact ceased with board liaisons, closing letters started going out for complaints filed. He is aware of a 2023 closure of complaint and now it is in the media in that area for fraudulent practice. He feels that if the liaison was consulted in that case, the matter would have come before the board in an administrative complaint. He questions whether the OAG is complicit in continuing fraud. That is his concern with liaisons not being utilized anymore.

Section Chief Kennedy indicated they are trying to utilize liaisons less, so they do not have to recuse themselves in administrative hearings so often. They are looking at getting expert witnesses rather than using board members, so they don't have to recuse themselves. They need the board member expertise in administrative hearings. That was the reason for using liaisons less. They are starting to send some more standard questions to the liaisons rather than sending the entire file. They will keep the answers to these standard questions in a repository to utilize on future complaints.

T. Sproles indicated past experience has shown that the OAG staff don't have enough experience with the nuances of funeral service to properly investigate without liaison assistance. T. Sproles has experience in settlement conferences where he has brought up specific statutes because he is a funeral director and the DAG was not aware of the statute and the coalition to the case. He is deeply concerned about the profession. The licensees know they can get away with violations because the board has no authority until the OAG files an administrative complaint. He would like to see more action brought before the board.

Section Chief Kennedy indicated that based on the numbers of complaints filed with the OAG they reported earlier, most of the potential violations board members are hearing about are not being filed with the OAG as consumer complaints. Half of complaints come from PLA. They are not just closing complaints for no reason. They refer to closings for a pattern for future complaints.

F. Downing asked what subject matter expert Section Chief Kennedy uses when reviewing cases to determine whether to close, issue a warning letter, or file an administrative complaint. Section Chief Kennedy indicated she uses her investigators and DAGs' knowledge of the board when making that determination right now.

F. Downing indicated he had asked DAG Mathews at the December meeting about the status of a possible administrative complaint regarding Crown Cremations and Mathews had said he hoped to wrap it up by the end of the year, however it is still not on the board's agenda. The board members are very frustrated that they are not being able to protect the public. His interaction with his peers is that they do not file complaints because they feel nothing will be done.

Compliance presentation: Inspector Courtney Calvert reported that their number of inspections has increased since they implemented new inspection procedures to increase funeral inspections. : Inspector Calvert does more funeral inspections than ever before. Now that the OAG notifies them if they close a file or issue a warning letter, they can better gauge when they need to re-inspect a facility. She feels inspectors are subject matter experts and thinks any complaint filed by them should result in an administrative complaint. Correction action plans have increased. It gives PLA more control to follow up for compliance.

Inspector Calvert filed complaints for the boards she works with equaling over 100 last year. She does not know at this time which were funeral matters. She is aware of several years she filed complaints against the same licensee every year with no action by the OAG until it hit the news. She feels the OAG is getting better and has more trust in their process.

T. Sproles feels preneed fraud and unlicensed individuals practicing in funeral homes are the biggest issues. Compliance Director Zaneta Nunnally indicated they run a report of expired licenses and conduct inspections accordingly. Director Nunnally explained all the different inspection scenarios and how her division handles them. With their new funeral inspection process, they are increasing their inspection numbers. She also requires her staff to attend the IFDA Crash Review course. They will add inspections based on expired funeral directors to ensure they are not practicing. Inspector Calvert explained how inspections are conducted and the outside tools they use to do so.

DAG Mathews indicated it is hard to discover preneed fraud unless an inspector gets lucky and finds one of the files during an inspection. He also indicated it may be hard to find a funeral director subject matter expert to testify before the board because they will have to testify against their peers.

T. Sproles indicated he will work with the Indiana Funeral Directors Association for preneed reform to restrict funeral directors from their ability to offer preneed if they violate procedures. C. Cooke will get with the Indiana Cemetery Association to suggest they review the cemetery law and make any needed changes. The board members volunteered to visit the OAG to answer any questions they may have about the profession. The board thanked everyone for the hard work they do.
